

SPECIAL AGENT EPPING

GBC

The Infiltrator

Throughout your 20 years with the FBI, you have infiltrated terrorist cells, cults, peacenik organizations, neo-communist groups, and nearly any other type of group that might pose a threat to the United States. You have always been very good at mimicry. You blend in, you don't get noticed. You're careful, slow, methodical. You don't draw attention to yourself, especially at first. James Bond would have made a terrible agent. It's all about finding the targets and gradually becoming one of them.

You have never been the sort of person who bonds well with other people. That helps in your line of work. You don't get attached to the groups you work with, and you don't have too many close friends who might learn your secrets. You don't need to be the leader of any group, or anyone's best friend, just someone with whom the group members feel comfortable. You want to be just competent enough that they include you, while not special enough to be singled out. You've gotten very good at that role. While you could have been promoted out of the field years ago, you never wanted to be in charge of other people. You were happier being a loner in every group.

Recently you have been investigating a small cult in Maryland. While they only number 24 at this point, they seem to be growing. It's centered around The Prophet David, a man who claims alternately to be the second coming, the Jewish Messiah, and a whole lot of other things. Like most of these cults, a lot of it seems to be about David getting as many nubile women into his bed as possible. Last you heard he had 7 wives. You have slowly worked your way into the cult as a supplicant, interested in joining. All the religious mumbo-jumbo is a bit tiring, but you've worked with worse.

Chief Obanhein is the Chief of Police for DC. Obenhein is a typical, mildly corrupt, city cop. You have done several cases in the city that involved working with Obanheim's officers. They can be sloppy, but they get the work done, and they usually understand that, when you're there, you're in charge.

Director Mercer is the head of the FBI. You aren't the sort of person who ascends ranks, so you don't know Mercer well. You've met Mercer once or twice, usually when something has gone very wrong.

Special Agent Pelletier is an assassin for the naval police. That's a nasty job, but you're glad there are people to do it. You appreciate that sort of back-up when you need it.

Lietenant Danbridge should never have gotten into officer school. People like that are meant to be on the ground, not giving orders.

Dr. Cruz is the head of the CDC, and you have gotten stuck with Cruz or other CDC agents occasionally when cults have decided to spread anthrax to everyone, or something dumb like that. Cruz is a civilian, and hard to work with for that reason, but not too bad for all that. Cruz wants things to run smoothly, and they usually do.
